Our Story

Seymour Stein's office sits way up in the high rises of the Rockefeller Plaza; a corner office, with a beautiful view out over New York City, its surfaces cluttered with all of the memorabilia, awards and accumulated paraphernalia of a lifetime spent in the music industry.

It was into this office that the six members of Delta Rae shuffled one day in the summer of 2011. A rather convoluted connection had led them here to this meeting, their first with a major record label, and no one was quite sure how to proceed. "We were very nervous," recalls Ian Holljes, with perhaps some understatement.

"But we talked briefly, and then Seymour said 'Well, why don't you sing something for me?'" The band duly launched into Hey Hey Hey, a joyous, rollicking tune that begins with an exquisite four-part harmony. Ten seconds in, Stein asked them to stop. The band balked. But Stein stood up, walked to the door and hollered for his colleagues to join them. "You gotta hear these people!" he cried into the hallway. "They sound so beautiful!"
